Are you ready for the newest reporting framework?

We will train you!

The Global Reporting Initiative (GRI) published the latest version of their sustainability reporting framework, the GRI Standards, at the end of 2016. In our certified training courses, you will be introduced to this new framework and will learn how to generate a sustainability report in accordance with the GRI Standards. Examples of best practices and group discussions provide you with practical insights that help you applying the GRI Standards to your sustainability report.

What is GRI?

- The Global Reporting Initiative (GRI) was founded in 1997 by CERES in partnership with the United Nations Environmental Program (UNEP).

- Using a participative process, GRI develops guidelines for sustainability reporting for major companies, SMEs, governments and NGOs around the world.

- The framework is based on defined principles and indicators, which help organizations improve their economic, ecological and social performance and provide structured and transparent reporting on their progress.

- Reporting according to the GRI Standards provides decision-makers with the information needed to take actions that lead to a sustainable economy.

Two-day training for beginners

This training is for people from organizations not yet reporting according to any GRI framework, or those who would like to fundamentally refresh their knowledge of GRI reporting. No prior knowledge is needed.

The course will provide:

- Detailed insights into the GRI Standards and their application in corporate reporting

- Best practices – examples from businesses

- Practical group exercises and discussions

- GRI training certificate

Half-day training for experienced reporters
